

Desktop Migration Readiness Module

Should My Clients Upgrade to Windows 7?

We're guessing you don't know.

It's a question you dread, yet know is coming. Should we upgrade to Windows 7? The problem is, you don't know. Will the new operating system be as problematic as Windows Vista or as robust as Windows XP? What will it cost to upgrade everyone's machine? Do we need to do any system upgrades first? Are all computers effectively backed up? Will desktop applications and settings be migrated over? It's enough to make your head spin.

However, it's important that your clients need to ask. And you should definitely have the answer.

Kaseya's Desktop Migration Module has a built-in Upgrade Readiness Report that provides all necessary migration information at your fingertips, giving you and the client a realistic and accurate picture of the procedures required for migration as well as the required investment in hardware and software. Leveraging existing IT asset information already captured in the Kaseya IT Automation Framework, the Upgrade Readiness Report collects IT asset information such as processor speed, CPU usage, licensing data and backup status and matches it to operating system requirements, determining what steps will need to be conducted to migrate each machine.

Kaseya then spits out an analysis based on workflow models, giving you an accurate estimate of time required and cost. Specific pricing from preferred vendors can be included in the cost analysis, giving you an accurate and realistic estimate. You and your client can then sit down and talk about whether the migration is cost prohibitive or matches the organization's IT and business goals.

Estimates are tricky, often taking weeks to gather pertinent information and calculating proposed work. And, even then, they are hardly accurate. Kaseya provides this information in a matter of minutes in a graphically-rich report that is easy to understand.
